Overview

If you're a woman facing a divorce or custody case and you suspect your husband is a narcissist, especially if people look at you like you're crazy when you say that, you're in the right place. I'm David Crum, a divorce and family law attorney with over 25 years of experience. I'm the managing attorney at our firm and I'm the author of the book Confessions of a Divorce Assassin. I made my career representing women in challenging divorce and custody cases, and specifically in cases where I had to take over for an attorney who screwed up the case or just couldn't handle it. You can imagine how difficult that is. But as difficult as it was for me, I know it was 10 times harder for my clients who had to go through it. And in many of those cases, I believe the husbands we were dealing with were showing all the classic signs of a narcissist, and you have to deal with those people in a much different way.

The reason I decided to write this eBook is so that no one has to go through the kind of experiences that many of my clients had to go through when I took over their cases. The one thing that they all had in common was they all had picked attorneys who either did not take the husband's mental state seriously, or were completely unable to deal with it.

I'm going to tell you right up front, that many lawyers do not like me and do not agree what with some of the things I'm about to tell you in this eBook, because it can be a little bit embarrassing to the legal community and a lot of attorneys just do not have answers when potential clients ask the questions that I give them. But, if you're here, I think you're here to learn the truth, so I'm going to teach you some of the main strategies you can employ when dealing with a narcissist.

So let me get right into it. There's a lot you need to know about this and a lot I would like to teach you. First and foremost, I need to tell you that I am not a doctor or a psychiatrist or psychologist, I am only talking about my personal experience with husbands who exhibit some of the identified traits of narcissists. Just to give you a roadmap I am going to talk about 4 things: lack of empathy, frequent lies and exaggerations, false image projection, and rule breaking and boundary violation.

Four Traits To Look For If You Think You Might Be Married To A Narcissist

Lack of Empathy

Let's start with lack of empathy. This simply means that your husband cannot put himself in your shoes or understand what you need as part of your divorce. Now, this may sound obvious, but what this means is that a mediated divorce is completely out of the question. You should never try to mediate your divorce with a narcissist, because a good mediation is based on something called needs based negotiation, that's where you are negotiating based on the real needs of the parties. Narcissistic husbands can simply not understand that so there will always be a very difficult positional bargaining that goes on. I have had many women come to me after going through a mediated divorce with a narcissist, who by the way are very good at convincing them that they should do a mediation, because manipulation is another hallmark trait of a narcissist, and the deal they got is horribly unfair. Unfortunately, there's absolutely nothing I can do because the agreement had already been reached and courts will enforce that almost 100% of the time. This is not to say that you won't be in settlement negotiations with your attorney and your husband and your husband's attorney, but that has to be handled far differently when you're dealing with a narcissist. In fact, you and your attorney must be keenly aware of all the points that we discuss, meaning lack of empathy, frequent lies and exaggeration, false image projection and rule breaking and boundary violation when it comes to participating in a negotiation. This also means that if the Court forces you to use a third party for mediation, and this often happens in custody cases, your attorney should make the mediator aware of the dynamic in the relationship, and you should have access to your attorney before you agree to the settlement of any issues.

Frequent Lies and Exaggerations

Frequent lies and exaggerations are another area that have a major impact on divorce cases. Where I see them the most are contained in court pleadings, during testimony at trial or in evidentiary hearings, and again in settlement negotiations. So, it is important that you assist your attorney and that your attorney immediately corrects any false statements that are made in your divorce pleadings.

As an attorney, I personally never let a false statement pass, unless it is extremely trivial, without addressing it in my own responses to the court. When it comes to testimony at trial or in evidentiary hearings, it is important that you have gathered and provided objective evidence to your attorney. This can include text messages, emails, audio and video recordings, and any other documents or witness testimony that will contradict what your husband is going to testify to and say in court. As part of your preparation for hearings, and hearings are often required when you're dealing with a narcissist, your attorney should work with you to anticipate the kind of lies and exaggerations your narcissist husband could tell in court, and then line up the objective evidence that will show your husband to be a liar. Many, many times, I have used emails and text messages and other documents to impeach the credibility of a narcissistic husband. After you do that once or twice in court, the judge begins to question your husband's credibility in everything he says.

False Image Projection

The third issue is dealing with false image projection. The way this is usually described to me by female clients is that their husband pretends to be this great guy and everyone thinks he's a great guy, when in reality he's really terrible. Where this worries me the most is during mediations that the court orders, and even more importantly if the parties go through a custody evaluation and are dealing with a custody evaluator. In those situations, I think it is important to make the evaluator aware of your position as it relates to your husband's mental state, but again that should be done with objective evidence and is typically best communicated first through your lawyer.

It is not best practice to run to the psychologist with this narcissism claim, because a lot of people say that when it's not true, so you have to present the evidence carefully to anyone looking at your case and it best to do it first through your attorney. Luckily, very often in a custody evaluation where the evaluator is administering psychological tests, the evaluator will find some of these things through testing. But just like dealing with lies and exaggerations, objective evidence is one of the most powerful ways to combat this false image projection.

Rule Breaking and Boundary Violation

The last issue is rule breaking and boundary violation. This can play out in a number of different ways. If your husband is physically aggressive, I will often deal with a narcissist by seeking a restraining order or order of protection in your case, which allows me to insulate you not only from the physical presence of your husband but from the other types of manipulative communication that I often see in these cases. The other rule breaking and boundary violation that I see is that narcissists often will not follow court orders, and may set unrealistic deadlines.

There are essentially two ways to deal with this. If the violation is significant, I immediately file a motion relating to the violation, sometimes that is called an order to show cause. I am relentless in doing that until the husband's attorney or the judge in the case brings the husband under control. But the other thing that you need to be very careful of, is that a narcissist will often break rules just to manipulate you into spending a lot of time and a lot of attorney's fees in dealing with every little rule violation. In those instances, your strategy may be to simply do nothing, and to ask the court to order you into a settlement facilitation or to have a final trial in your case where you have more control. Even though those are significant steps, at the end of the day it can be quicker, and a better use of your resources to do that instead of dealing with every rule violation.

The Cost of Hiring the Right Lawyer to Help You Divorce a Narcissist

The last thing I want to talk about is the cost of hiring the right lawyer to handle your case. Listen, if you have a nothing divorce, meaning you don't have much property and you pretty much agree on everything, then find whatever fits in your budget. You may want to do an uncontested divorce, represent yourself, or go online and use a service like LegalZoom. In all other instances in which you are dealing with a narcissist on the other side, especially if you have things like retirement, a home, debt, and unresolved custody issues, you need to find the right attorney regardless of the cost. I'm not trying to be flippant when I say this, and I know that can be financially challenging, but hiring somebody because they have a low retainer, or because they have a lower hourly rate, is not going to solve your financial problems or allow you to deal with your husband effectively. An ineffective and inexperienced attorney will end up costing you thousands of dollars more than hiring the right attorney in the first place. So whoever you talk to, have them talk to you about dealing with your husband, and judge that against what you just learned here today.
